Anna and Paul are the perfect pair. They enjoy each other's company and both have a thing for football - she hates it and he loves it. Despite this one major conflict, they love each other passionately. Anna knows Paul through and through... or so she thought. It's only after she gives up her job in Berlin to move with him back to his hometown where he's been offered a career advancement that she learns the painful truth. The reality is that not only does Paul love football... he's obsessed with it. Years ago he helped found the town's football club and when he left town, he promised that he'd return if an emergency arose. Now, with their best player out due to an illness, the team needs him desperately! In shocked disbelief, Anna listens as the other "footballer's wives" explain exactly what awaits her. Every Sunday she is fated to adorn the sidelines and watch the untalented but highly enthusiastic guys play football. Then, after the game, the wives accompany the testosterone-pumped team to the club bar where they are forced to endure the exaggerated boasts of the day's heroically played game. Anna blows a fuse and offers the guys a bet - the girls against the guys in a full, 90 minute-long football match. If the women win, then King Football will be dethroned forever in their little town, but if the guys win, then the wives' ceaseless complaining will come to a screeching halt and life will become one huge and endless football heaven! Paul and his pals eagerly accept, completely unaware of Anna's little secret: up until the age of fifteen she played on the girl's national team...
